But the most important thing is that it gives you an enormous advantage. It allows you to make the upgrade to a CAD program without losing the time that would have been wasted trying to learn the manual part of the older system. The second point is that, assuming that you learn how to use the new program, the time and money you invest are going to pay big dividends. Not only will you be able to get better printouts and models that are more accurate (and free you from the pain of having to constantly recopy them), but the new system is going to make you more efficient and it will probably do so for a long time after you stop using it. In fact, I'd go so far as to suggest that in most cases you'll actually save time and money using the new system because the new system is designed to eliminate the error rate that is inherent in manual drafting. The learning curve is not a serious problem with these systems. If you have practiced drawing and are reasonably intelligent, you'll pick them up in a short time. If you have a bad memory, study the book or manual carefully before you start. And if you have a bad memory, you'll learn to write code so you can go to the library and check every two minutes whether or not you have a pencil in your mouth. The new system is much more demanding than the old one. In general, it's much easier to spend a lot of time working on it than on the old system, but that's not going to bother you when it's working correctly. The problem with the old system is that it doesn't know what you want. It doesn't know how you want your model to be printed. It doesn't know whether you want your model to be symmetrical, or how many times it should be rotated to make the end-product look as good as it can. In other words, the old system is designed to take much more time than the new one, but the f678ea9f9e
